Q: As a Paranormal Investigator, do you believe in mediums?

We asked The Paranormal Godfather - AKA Gary Sullivan - for his take on the question. Each issue we'll pose your questions to our experienced panel. Send your questions to:

editor@supernalmagazineaustralia.com.au

A: With over 40 years in the paranormal field, working on Haunted Australia, Chronicles X, and with Australian Ghost Adventures, I've used all sorts of gear trying to prove the paranormal exists.

Here's my truth though: equipment can't always be trusted. It's helpful, sure. However for me, a good medium is the sharpest tool in the kit when walking into a potentially haunted site.

Let the medium go in first. Let them feel the space, pinpoint the hotspots. That gives you a map, a real edge, for setting up your tech: cameras, recorders, whatever you've got.

Then, if something hits, you can cross-check it with the medium's impressions. If they line up? Now you've got something worth digging into.

So yes; I believe mediums are a powerful asset. Don't ghost hunt without one!

PARANORMAL UNITY TAKES CENTRE STAGE AT KRYAL CASTLE

The Australian Paranormal Conference & Expo 2025 lit up the cobblestones of Kryal Castle on Saturday 1 March, drawing teams from across the supernatural spectrum.

Supernal Magazine was proud to attend, with Editor, Anthony Kilner, taking to the stage to champion Para Unity and officially launch the magazine's new Paranormal Pages.

The afternoon buzzed with talks from passionate investigators and professionals exploring all things unexplained. Notably, David Nesbitt of Haunted Hardware, proud sponsor of Paranormal Pages, shared his personal journey into the paranormal realm, leaving attendees both intrigued and inspired.

The expo, running from 6 PM to midnight, saw strong engagement from the public and stallholders alike. Despite a whirlwind night for Kilner manning his Supernal/Bridging Realms stand, the energy remained high, with smiles all round by the end. Event organiser Raven of Paranormal Adventures Australia closed the evening with well-earned pride, and plans for more to come. S

THROUGH THE VORTEX

By Anthony Kilner

IT was broad daylight; bright, clear and deceptively normal. Just another house call... or so I thought.

A young couple had contacted me, concerned about strange activity in their home. Things were moving on their own, unexplained smells were drifting through rooms and the atmosphere was becoming increasingly oppressive. They were sleep-deprived, anxious and confused.

The moment I stepped inside I felt it. The energy hit me like static - heavy, sticky and swirling with unrest. As I walked into the lounge room, my senses locked on a focal point right in the middle of the space. A vortex. An energetic whirlpool was spinning right there, not visible to the eye, yet undeniable to my system. It twisted in my gut and made the hairs on my arms shoot up.

"This room's wide open," I told them. "There's something big moving through here."

"The moment I stepped inside I felt it. The energy hit me like static - heavy, sticky and swirling with unrest."

The woman looked at her partner, then back at me. "I... I only just pulled down the pole. I've been doing dancing here, pole dancing and, well... there's been drugs and alcohol. Party energy, I guess."

I nodded slowly. That explained a lot. Altered states, intense emotional output and open vulnerability, all of that creates a potent beacon. Combine that with unresolved trauma and you're inviting in all sorts of spiritual hitchhikers. They'd opened the door and something, or many some things, had walked in.

As I moved into the dining room, I stopped again. There they stood as clear as day in spirit form: a woman, a man and a young child. Not threatening, just... present. Stuck.

I asked the bloke, "Have you been doing anything spiritual in this space?"

“This wasn’t just a wandering spirit. He was violating boundaries, feeding off discomfort.”

He hesitated. “I’ve been using a Ouija board at the table... trying to talk to my mates. They died in a car crash last year.”

I told him, “They’re here, but they can’t move on because you keep calling them back. You have to let them go.”

We did the work with the help of my guides; gently helping his friends to move on to their next evolution and closing down the residual doorways. I could feel the air lighten a little.

Then we headed into the bedroom. And that’s where things got nasty.

The moment I stepped inside, I was hit with an acrid psychic stench, like rot mixed with fear. It left a horrible metallic taste in my mouth too. The energy was dark and heavy, as if something was crouching just out of sight. As I tuned in, I caught sight of a male spirit. Wiry frame, greasy hair, hollow eyes and a deeply invasive energy.

The woman’s face went pale. “I’ve been finding my bras and undies laid out on the bed when I get home. I never do that.”

This wasn’t just a wandering spirit. He was violating boundaries, feeding off discomfort. It took some heavy spiritual lifting and a firm shove to get him out.

The ensuite was worse. That’s where she’d been touched. Multiple times.

Steamy handprints left in the condensation, despite being alone in the house. She’d thought she was losing her mind.

“No,” I said, “you’re not. But you’ve had multiple entities crossing your space. Some attached to the vortex. Some brought in through trauma. All feeding on the chaos.”

We worked through each pocket of activity, one room at a time. Spirits were shifted on. Spaces were smudged, sealed and blessed. It was tough going; bit by bit, the house was being cleared.

Then, just as I thought we were finished, I felt it. “There’s still something,” I said, following the gut-pull to a closed door near the kitchen. “What’s in there?”

“The laundry,” they replied.

I opened the door and copped a punch to the solar plexus, so strong I doubled over. Nearly vomiting. Whatever was in there did not want me sniffing around.

This wasn’t a person. It wasn’t even a spirit in the traditional sense. It was a parasitic presence; dark, dense and territorial. Something born of repeated emotional breakdowns and amplified by substances and spiritual dabbling. A proper bottom-feeder. And it was angry that I was clearing its playground.

I threw everything I had at that room, bells, prayer, sacred symbols, vibration, crystal work. What seemed like hours, sweat pouring down my back, we finally shifted it. I did a final full-house smudge and set a grid to hold neutral energy for the weeks ahead.

Before I left, I told them gently, “These portals aren’t random. You opened them with ungrounded energy, grief, altered states... it became a perfect storm.” »

- Reader's Story

HAUNTED HARDWARE
PARANORMAL EQUIPMENT

I grounded myself hard afterwards. Salt bath. Earth time. You can't walk through a psychic war zone and not clean your boots afterwards.

A week later, I followed up. The energy in the house was calm. The couple said they hadn't touched alcohol or drugs since; the craving just disappeared. They were sleeping better. Clearer. Lighter.

Not every haunting starts with a tragedy. Sometimes, it's what we invite in, knowingly or not, that cracks the veil. And once it's open, anything can walk through.

Lesson learned. $

"You can't walk through a psychic war zone and not clean your boots afterwards."
